Feature Explanations

ROLEPLAY · PASSIVE

Ranger Favored Enemy

At the table: You have experience with certain enemies. That helps you read tracks, judge behavior, and treat those creatures as important in the story.

Mechanically: Your chosen enemy type is noted on the sheet. When it appears in the adventure, the DM can give you fitting benefits for knowledge, tracking, or reading the situation.

Human Versatility

At the table: Humans are flexible. This character is not locked into one specific origin idea and fits into almost any group.

Mechanically: This bonus already helped during character creation. The extra scores or choices are already included on page 1.

Forest

At the table: Forest feels like the classic nature Druid: plants, climbing, storms, and protection. This choice fits well if you want straightforward and versatile nature magic.

Mechanically: You gain additional Circle Spells: Barkskin, Spider Climb, Call Lightning, and Plant Growth. These spells are always prepared for you and do not count against the number of Druid spells you prepare.

Ranger Natural Explorer

At the table: You know a certain kind of wilderness especially well. Your Ranger feels like someone who can read paths, weather, and danger there.

Mechanically: Your chosen terrain is noted on the sheet. In that terrain, you are much more reliable when traveling, tracking, and navigating.

Beasts

At the table: Natural animals and beasts.

Mechanically: Counts as your Favored Enemy.
